Additional Data: The Teague house is one of the most beautiful in this section and is a typical example of the two story box type of southern home. It would possibly be classed as a Greek Revival type, and it is more refined than the average Greek Revival home. One of the most unusual features is the Ionic columns which have been preserved in excellent condition. The plan of the house and the out buildings, is typical to the period and the various details such as columns and windows are beautiful in proportion both to the mass of the building and to themselves. (Lutz)

George Whitman was one of the original land speculators of the old Alabama Company, the Alabama Town promoted by them being one of the subsequent parts of the Montgomery Incorporation of 1819. Lewis Owen was the original settler in Montgomery, a jeweler of national reputation, a man of considerable means and who built two of the towns most handsome houses one, the Loeb house which was later dismentled for the Post Office, the other, the present office building of the Alabama Baptists Mission Board): Thomas Welch was United States Postmaster in Montgomery in 1859 continuing to the spring of 1861, when he became Confederate Postmaster. He was one of those who issued a provisional stamp; this item now commands a large premium. Berry Owen, who built the residence on this lot was a business man interested in livery stables and other projects.

The residence was used by General James Wilson as his headquarters from April 12, to April 14, 1865, while he stopped here on his march through Alabama. It was from the steps of this building that the proclamation taking formal command of the city was read. The surrender of the city to General Wilson did not take place here.
